

āmīl, devoted also to the poets "from the time of al-Farazdaq down to our own day" and to the ‘ulamā’ of Baḥrayn; it has been further enriched recently by the Takmilat Amal al-āmīl by the sayyid Ḥusayn Ṣadr al-Dīn. Among the numerous works of shaykh al-Ḥurr (who was quite prepared to collect the ḥadīths of the Ahl al-Sunna) there is also a diwān of 20,000 verses, according to his contemporary, the sayyid ‘Alī Khān Madanī Shīrāzī in his Sulāfat al-‘aṣr.

Bibliography: Muḥammad Bākīr al-Kh^{ān}-sārī, Rawḍat al-djannāt, Tehrān 1306, 544-6 (= 644-6); Mirzā Muḥammad Tanukābunī, Kiṣaṣ al-‘ulamā’, Tehrān n.d., 289-93; Ākā Buzurg Tīhrānī, al-Dharī‘a ilā taṣānif al-Shī‘a, ii, Naḍjaf 1355, n. 129 and iii, Naḍjaf 1357, n. 393; idem, Muṣaffa ‘l-makāl fī muṣannifi ‘ilm al-ridjāl, Tehrān 1378, cols. 401-2; Muḥammad ‘Alī Tabrizī Khīyābānī (Mudarris), Rayḥanat al-adab fī tarāḍīm al-ma‘rūfīn bi ‘l-kunya wa ‘l-lakab, i, Tehrān 1366, 315-6; Muḥsin al-Amin al-‘Āmilī, A‘yān al-shī‘a, xlv, 52-64. (G. SCARCIA)

HURRIYYA, "freedom," an abstract formation derived from ḥurr "free" corresponding to Hebrew ḥōr, Aram. ḥēr (herūā), widely used also in Muslim languages other than Arabic. Already in pre-Islamic times, "free" was known not only as a legal term denoting the opposite of "unfree, slave" (‘abd [q.v.]) but also as an ethical term denoting those "noble" of character and behavior. The legal concept of "freedom" continued to be used as a matter of course by Muslim jurists, who were inclined to give preference to the presumption of a free status for individuals in doubtful cases [see ‘ABD] but otherwise accepted the existence of slavery and the deprivation of a section of humanity of their freedom without questioning, at least openly, the moral foundations. In the ethical sense, the superiority of the ḥurr, showing in his gentlemanly behavior, his generosity, his readiness to suffer for a noble cause, was constantly extolled in poetry and prose. The Greco-Arabic translation literature introduced the Muslims to some sayings illustrating Greek thinking on the problem of freedom; at the same time, it helped to reinforce the equation of "free" and "noble" and added some confusion of its own through the use of hurriyya to translate eleutheriotēs "generosity" in the Aristotelian canon of virtues. Furthermore, the writings of philosophers such as al-Fārābī and Ibn Ruṣḥd took some limited cognizance of "freedom" as a political term. In Muslim metaphysical speculation, hurriyya came to occupy a rather significant position through Ṣūfism. It appears as one of the guideposts on the mystic path in the Luma’ of al-Sarrāḍī and in the Risāla of his successor al-Kuṣhayrī. Through the Risāla in particular, it gained a firm place in Ṣūfī literature. For the mystic, "freedom" is basically the freedom from everything except God and the devotion to Him. It is the recognition of the essential relationship between God the master and His human slaves who are completely dependent on Him, "freedom," as Ibn ‘Arabī expresses it, "being perfect slavery" (al-l‘lām bi-ishārāt ahl al-ilhām, Ḥaydarābād 1362, 8). However, one also hears about the existence of men who defended the necessity of "absolute freedom" (O. Pretzl, Die Streitschrift des Gazālī gegen die Ibāḥīja, in SBBayer. Ak. 1933, text 27 f., trans. 51).

Hurriyya, although much discussed, did not achieve the status of a fundamental political concept that could have served as a rallying cry for great causes. Only this much can be stated with assurance.

Beyond it, any evaluation of the situation prevailing in mediaeval Islam with regard to "freedom," in the way in which the term is generally if loosely used in the contemporary West, depends on the particular view one holds of "freedom" and the definition one chooses to give to the concept. Obviously, the actual situation varied greatly over the vast expanse of Muslim history, but some basic lines may be said to define the general picture: The individual Muslim was expected to consider subordination of his own freedom to the beliefs, morality, and customs of the group as the only proper course of behaviour. While he valued his personal freedom and was proud of it, he was not supposed to see in it a good to be defended at all costs against group demands. Politically, the individual was not expected to exercise any free choice as to how he wished to be governed. At times, he did stress his right to be considered and treated as an equal by the men in power. Under special circumstances, there was extensive community participation in the government (as, for instance, in early Islam or among certain sectarians), or, at least, a certain degree of wider distribution of the political power among the population (as, perhaps, in city states such as Seville). In general, however, governmental authority admitted of no participation of the individual as such, who therefore did not possess any real freedom vis-à-vis it. On the metaphysical level, the question of how much freedom could be vouchsafed to human beings in view of the omnipotence of God has occupied the Muslim mind from the very beginnings of Islam [see ḤITTIVĀR]. Whatever concessions were made, however, were not made in the name of any kind of individual freedom, but in order to assure a better regulated society. Moreover, the widely adopted Ash‘arī solution of the free will dilemma, no less than all the others, was far too subtle for the masses to understand; at any rate it failed to impress them with the importance of the element of human freedom it contained.

Bibliography: F. Rosenthal, The Muslim concept of freedom, Leiden 1960. For modern Muslim works on freedom which also pay some attention to the historical background, see the bibliography to the following section.

(F. ROSENTHAL)

ii.—MODERN PERIOD

The Ottoman Empire and after. The first examples of the use of the word freedom in a clearly defined political sense come from late 18th century Turkey. The word used is not hurriyya but serbestiyet (later also serbestī), pseudo-Arabic and pseudo-Persian abstracts from serbest, an established Ottoman term connoting the absence of limitations or restrictions (thus, serbest timār means a fief in which all the revenues go to the timariot, as against an ordinary timār in which certain revenues are reserved to the imperial exchequer [see TIMĀR]). In its first known appearance in an official document, the word serbestiyyet denotes collective rather than personal freedom—i.e., independence rather than liberty in the classical liberal sense. This is in the third article of the treaty of Küçük Kaynardja [q.v.] (1774), establishing the short-lived independence of the Crimean Tatars from both Turkey and Russia. The two states agree to recognize the Tatars as "free and entirely independent of any foreign power"; the Sultan is regarded as their religious head, "but without thereby compromising their political and civil liberty as established". The forms of words in the Italian original of the treaty for these two phrases are "liberi, immediati, ed indipendenti assolutamente da qualunque straniera Potenza" and "senza però mettere in compromesso la stabilita libertà loro politica e civile"; this is rendered in Turkish as serbestiyyet we ghayr-i ta'alluk mustakill wudjuhla edinebi bir dewlete tabi' olmamak üzre . . . and 'akd olunan serbestiyyet-i dewlet we memlekelerine khalet getirmiyerek (Turkish text in *Djewedet, Ta'rikh*³, i, 358-9; Medjma'a-i mu'ahedat, iii, 254; Italian in G. F. de Martens, Recueil des traités . . ., iv, Göttingen 1795, 610-2).

The French Revolution gave the word serbestiyyet a new meaning. Morall El-Seyyid 'Ali Efendi, the Ottoman ambassador in Paris under the Directoire, uses it several times in his sefaretname to translate liberté, chiefly in relation to symbols and ceremonies (e.g., TOEM, no. 23 [1329 A.H.], 1458, 1460. On the display of the 'symbols' of freedom by Frenchmen in Turkey, see *Djewedet, Ta'rikh*³, vi, 182-3). The Re'is al-Kutub 'Atif Efendi, in his memorandum of 1798 on the political situation resulting from the activities of revolutionary France, shows a clearer understanding of the new political content of the term, and of the danger that it represented to the established order, in the Ottoman Empire as elsewhere. In his introductory account of the Revolution, he tells how the revolutionaries had enticed the common people ('awamm-i nas) to follow them with promises of equality and freedom (musawwat we serbestiyyet) as a means of obtaining complete happiness in this world. More specifically, he is alarmed by the actions of the French in the former Venetian possessions which they had acquired—the Ionian islands and four towns on the mainland. By evoking the forms of the government of the ancient Greeks and installing a form of liberty (serbestiyyet), the French had made clear their hostile intentions (*Djewedet, Ta'rikh*³, vi, 395, 400; cf. B. Lewis in J. Wld. Hist., i (1953), 120 ff. (revised version in G. S. Métraux and F. Croizet, eds., The new Asia, New York-London 1965, 47 ff.), and Slavonic Review, xxxiv (1955), 234-5).

Before the end of the year the French had landed in Egypt, where General Bonaparte, on arrival, addressed the Egyptians on behalf of the French Republic, "founded on the basis of freedom and equality" ('ala asās al-hurriyya wa'l-iṣwāya: versions in Djabarti, Muḥir al-taḥdīs, Cairo n.d., i, 37; Nikūlā al-Turk, Muḥakkirāt, ed G. Wiet, Cairo 1950, 8; the text also appears in Djabarti, 'Adjā'ib, iii, Cairo 1879, 4; Ḥaydar al-Ṣihābi's Lubnān, etc.). The word used for freedom is hurriyya, which, however, was still far from being a commonly accepted equivalent to the European term in its political sense. Ruphy's French-Arabic wordlist, printed in 1802, renders liberté by hurriyya, but with the restriction "opposé à l'esclavage"; in the sense of "pouvoir d'agir" he prefers sarāḥ (J. F. Ruphy, Dictionnaire abrégé français-arabe, Paris, An X [1802], 120). As late as 1841 the Phanariot Handjeri renders "liberté civile" and "liberté politique" by ruḥṣat-i sher'iyye and ruḥṣat-i mülkiyye respectively (Dictionnaire français-arabe-persan et turc, ii, Moscow 1840-1, 397, with explanations and examples).

Early references to freedom in works of Muslim authorship are hostile, and equate it with libertinism, licentiousness, and anarchy. A significant change can, however, be seen in a passage in the chronicle of Ṣhānizāde ([q.v.] d. 1826) under the year 1230/1815, discussing the nature of council meetings (keyfiyyet-i medjālis-i meshweret), which became frequent at this time. Ṣhānizāde is careful to base the holding of such consultations on Islamic precedent and ancient Ottoman practice, and to give warning against its misuse; at the same time he points out that such consultations are normally held, with beneficial effects, in "certain well-organized states (düwel-i muntazama)"—a striking euphemism for the states of Europe—and attributes to the members attending the councils a representative quality entirely new to Islamic political thought. The members of the councils consist of two groups, servants of the state and representatives of the subjects (wühelā-i ra'iyet); they discuss and argue freely (ber wedj-h-i serbestiyyet) and thus arrive at a decision (Ṣhānizāde, Ta'rikh, iv, Istanbul 1291, 2-3; cf. B. Lewis, in BSOAS, xxix (1966), 385-6).

In the decades that followed, the notion of political freedom became more familiar through discussions of European affairs and translations of European works (e.g. the Turkish version of Botta's Storia d'Italia, Cairo 1249/1834, repr. Istanbul 1293/1876, which abounds in references to liberal principles and institutions). It was also discussed and developed by several Muslim writers, who were influenced more especially by the rather conservative constitutionalism of the post-Napoleonic era—the idea of the Rechtsstaat, or state based on the rule of law, in contrast both to the unbridled absolutism of Napoleon and the licence of the Revolution. One of the most important of these was the Egyptian Ṣhaykh Rifā'a Rāfi' al-Taḥṭāwī [q.v.], who lived in Paris from 1826 to 1831. His account of what he saw and learnt was first published in Bülāk in Arabic in 1834 and in a Turkish version in 1839; it includes a translation with commentary of the French constitution and a description of parliamentary institutions, the purpose of which is to secure government under law and the protection of the subject from tyranny. What the French call freedom (hurriyya), says Ṣhaykh Rifā'a, is the same as what the Muslims call justice and equity (al-'adl wa'l-iṣṣāf)—that is, the maintenance of equality before the law, government according to law, and the abstention of the ruler from arbitrary and illegal acts against the subject (Takhlīs al-ibris fi talkhīs Bāriz, ed. Maḥdī 'Allām, Aḥmad Badawī and Anwar Lūḳā, Cairo n.d. [1958?], 148). Ṣhaykh Rifā'a's equation of hurriyya with the classical Islamic concept of justice [see 'ADL, IṢṢĀF and ZULM] helped to relate the new to the old concepts, and fit his own political writings into the long line of Muslim exhortations to the sovereign to rule wisely and justly, with due respect for the law and due care for the interests and welfare of the subjects [see RA'YYYA and SIYĀSA]. What is new and alien to traditional political ideas is the suggestion that the subject has a right to be treated justly, and that some apparatus should be set up to secure that right. With remarkable percipience, Ṣhaykh Rifā'a sees and explains the different rôles of parliament, the courts and the press in protecting the subjects from tyranny—or rather, as he points out, in enabling the subjects to protect themselves. What is far from clear is the extent to which he felt these ideas and institutions to be relevant to the needs of his own country. In his later writings there is little suggestion of any such relevance; even his commendation of the Khedive Ismā'il for setting up a consultative assembly in 1866 shows a traditional concern with the duties of the ruler—justice and consultation—rather than a liberal concern with the rights of the ruled. In his al-Murshid al-amin (Cairo 1862, 127 ff.), he defines freedom under five sub-headings, the last two of which are civic (madanî) and political (siyâsî). Both are defined in relation to social, economic and legal rights, without any specific reference to political rights in the liberal sense. The first three sub-headings are natural, social (i.e., freedom of 'conduct') and religious. Political freedom is the assurance of the state to the individual of the enjoyment of his property and the exercise of his 'natural' freedom (i.e., the basic innate power of all living creatures to eat, drink, move etc., limited by the need to avoid injury to himself or to others) (see L. Zolondek, Al-Tahtâwî and political freedom, in MW, liv (1964), 90-7.)

Şaykh Rifâ'a's Turkish contemporary Şâdiķ Rif'at Pařa [q.v.], though vaguer in his theoretical notions of the meaning of freedom, is more specific on its immediate application at home. In an essay first drafted while he was Ottoman ambassador in Vienna in 1837—and in close touch with Metternich—he discusses the essential differences between Turkey and Europe, and those respects in which Turkey might profitably seek to imitate Europe. Şâdiķ Rif'at is deeply impressed by European wealth, industry and science, in which he sees the best means of regenerating Turkey. European progress and prosperity, he explains, are the result of certain political conditions, of stability and tranquillity, which in turn depend on 'the attainment of complete security for the life, property, honour and reputation of each nation and people, that is to say, on the proper application of the necessary rights of freedom (hukûk-ı lâzime-i hürriyyet)'. For Şâdiķ Rif'at, as for Şaykh Rifâ'a, freedom is an extension of the classical Islamic idea of justice—an obligation of the ruler to act justly and in accordance with the law; but it is also one of the "rights of the nation" (hukûk-ı millet), and the establishment of these rights in Turkey is a matter of "the most urgent necessity" (text in Şâdiķ Rif'at Pařa, Müntekhabât-ı âthâr, Istanbul, Avrûpanîñ aḥwâlîne dâ'ir . . . risâle, 4; cf. ibid., Idâre-i hukûmetiñ ba'd-ı ḥawâ'id-i esâsiyye-sini mutaḍammîn . . . risâle, passim; another version in 'Abd al-Raḥmân Şherif, Ta'riḫ muşâḥabeleri, Istanbul 1340, 125 f.). Similar ideas are expressed by another Turkish writer, Muşṭafâ Sâmi, a former Embassy secretary in Paris, who in an essay published in 1840 speaks with admiration of the political and religious liberties of the French. Such ideas find official expression in the first of the great reforming edicts—the ferman of the Rose-chamber (Gülkhâne) of 1839, which recognizes and seeks to establish the rights of the subject to security of life, honour and property, and to government under law. There are two specific references to freedom—in the clause guaranteeing that "everyone shall dispose of his property in all freedom (serbestiyyet)", and in the clause concerning the Councils, in which everyone present "shall express his ideas and observations freely (serbestce) and without hesitation." (Text in Düstûr, first series, i, 4-7; in modern script, in A. Şeref Gözübüyük and S. Kili, Türk anayasa metinleri, Ankara 1957, 3-5; English trans. in Hurewitz, i, 113-6).

These ideas of freedom are still very cautious and conservative; one would expect no other from Şaykh Rifâ'a, the loyal servant of the rulers of Egypt, or from Şâdiķ Rif'at, the disciple of Metternich and coadjutor of Reşid Pařa [q.v.]. The subjects were to be treated justly by the government; indeed, they had a right to be treated justly, and laws should be promulgated to secure such treatment. But there is still no idea that the subjects have any right to share in the formation or conduct of government—to political freedom, or citizenship, in the sense which underlies the development of liberal political thought in the West.

While conservative reformers talked of freedom under law, and some Muslim monarchs even experimented with councils and assemblies [see DÜSTÜR, MADİLİS, MASHWARA], government was in fact becoming more and not less arbitrary and oppressive. The modernization of government and the abrogation of intermediate powers at once strengthened the autocracy of the state, and removed or weakened the traditional limitations on its functioning. More authoritarian government provoked more radical criticism; the newly created and rapidly expanding press [see DIARİDA] provided a medium for its expression; 19th century Europe offered a wide range of inspiration and example.

The suggestion has been made that some of the Lebanese movements of the periods 1820-1 and 1840 may have been inspired or influenced by French Revolutionary ideologies of national liberation and political democracy. The documents on which these suggestions rest (Philippe and Farid Khâzin, Madî-mû'at al-muḥarrarât al-siyâsiyya wa'l-mufa'wâḍât al-duwâliyya 'an Süriyya wa-Lubnân, i, Djûniya 1910, 1 ff.) are few and uncertain, and may reflect the activities of French agitators more than any genuine local movement. A more definite expression of libertarian ideas occurs in an account of the revolt of the Maronites of Kisrawân in 1858-9, led by Tanyûs Shâhin [q.v.]; he is said to have aimed at "republican government" (hukûma dîmuhuriyya), probably meaning some form of representative government (Anṭûn al-'Aḳîḳî, ed. Yûsuf İbrâhîm Yazbak, Thawra wa-fitna fî Lubnân, Damascus 1938, 87; English trans. M. H. Kerr, Lebanon in the last years of feudalism . . ., Beirut 1959, 53. See further P. K. Hitti, The impact of the West on Syria and Lebanon in the nineteenth century, in J.Wld.Hist., ii (1955), 629-30).

The intensification of Western influence during and after the Crimean War on the one hand, and the growing internal political and economic pressures on the other, both helped to bring a revival of libertarian thought and activities in the eighteen sixties. In Turkey, Şhinâsi [q.v.] stressed the importance of freedom of expression in the introductory editorials both of Terâdjumân-i Aḥwâl (no. 1, 1277/1860) and of Taṣwîr-i Efkâr (no. 1, 15 June [O.S.] 1278/1862). In Syria, the Christian author Francis Fath Allâh al-Marrâsh [q.v.] wrote an allegorical dialogue (Ghâbat al-ḥaḳḳ, Beirut 1866, repr. Cairo 1298/1880-1), which includes a philosophic and political discussion of freedom, and of the conditions that are required to maintain it. More directly political in content was the work of a Muslim author, the famous Khayr al-Dîn Pařa [q.v.], one of the authors of the Tunisian constitutional enactment of 1861 (Aḳwâm al-masâlik fî ma'rifat aḥwâl al-mamâlik, Tunis 1284-5/1867-8; French trans. Réformes nécessaires aux états musulmans, Paris 1868; Turkish version, Istanbul 1296/1879). In this rather conservative programme of reform, Khayr al-Dîn examines the sources of European wealth and power, and finds them in the political institutions of Europe, which secure justice and freedom. Identifying the two, he makes some cautious and rather obscure recommendations on how to secure them in the Islamic state without violating or departing from Islamic traditions and institutions, by reliance on 'consultation' [see MASHWARA], since the consultation of ministers, 'ulamā', and notables is the authentic Islamic equivalent of the European system of representative and constitutional government. It may be noted that neither as chief minister in Tunisia in the years 1873-7, nor as Grand Vizier in Turkey in 1878-9, did he do anything to restore the constitutions which had been suspended in both countries.

Already in 1856, in an ode addressed to Reshîd Pasha on the occasion of the Reform Edict of that year, Şhinâsî tells the reforming Pasha "You have made us free (âzâd), who were slaves to oppression (zulm)" and continues: "Your law is an act of manumission (itkânâme) for men, your law informs the Sultan of his limits (bildirir haddini)."

The radical implications of these words—the replacement of justice by freedom as the antithesis of tyranny, and the suggestion of a constitutional restriction of the sovereign's powers—were developed and made clear in the late sixties and seventies by the group of liberal patriots known as the Young (strictly "new") Ottomans [see YENİ OTHMÂNÎLÂR]. The political ideas of the Young Ottomans, though couched in Islamic terms and related, sometimes with visible effort, to Islamic traditions, are of European origin, and express an Ottoman-Islamic adaptation of the liberal patriotism current in Europe at that time. Their ideal was the British parliament at Westminster, their ideology was drawn from the liberal teachings of the French enlightenment and revolution, their organization and tactics were modelled on the patriotic secret societies of Italy and Poland. In the political writings of the Young Ottomans the two key words are Wâtan [q.v.]—fatherland, and Hürriyyet—freedom. The latter was the name of the weekly journal which they published in exile (London, June 1868–April 1870; Geneva, April–June 1870). In this journal, and in other writings, the Young Ottoman ideologists, above all Nâmlık Kemâl [q.v.], expounded their interpretation of liberty—the sovereignty of the people, to be secured by constitutional and representative government (see for example the article from Hürriyyet published by M. Colombe in French translation in Orient, no. 13 (1960), 123–33). For Kemâl as for earlier Muslim writers, the primary duty of the state is still to act justly—but justice means not only care for the welfare of the subject, but respect for his political rights. These rights must be safeguarded by appropriate institutions: "To keep the government within the limits of justice, there are two basic devices. The first of them is that the fundamental rules by which it operates should no longer be implicit or tacit, but should be published to the world... The second principle is consultation (meshveret), whereby the legislative power is taken away from the government" (Nâmlık Kemâl, Hukûk-i 'umûmiyye, in İbret, no. 18, 1872; repr. in Ebül-Diyâ Tewfik, Nümüne-i edebiyât-ı Othmâniyye, Istanbul 1306, 357–8, and, in the new Turkish script, in Mustafa N. Özön, Namık Kemal ve İbret gazetesi, Istanbul 1938, 96–7; English trans. in Lewis, Emergence, 140). Like his predecessors, Nâmlık Kemâl tries to present these imported ideas as natural developments from traditional Islamic notions; in this way justice grows into freedom and consultation into representation. Thus far, Nâmlık Kemâl and his associates had been anticipated by earlier 19th century writers, and even to some extent by rulers, who had summoned councils and issued edicts [see DÜSTÜR, MADJLIS, MASHWARA]. But the Young Ottomans, both in thought and actions, went far beyond their cautious forerunners. For Nâmlık Kemâl, a consultative assembly, even an elected one, is not enough. The essence of the matter is that this assembly be the exclusive possessor of the legislative power, of which the government would thus be deprived. This doctrine of the separation of powers, to be expressed in and maintained by a written constitution, is supported by the even more radical idea of the sovereignty of the people, which Nâmlık Kemâl identifies with the classical bay'a [q.v.]. "The sovereignty of the people (hâkimiyet-i ahâlî), which means that the powers of the government derive from the people, and which in the language of the Sharî'a is called bay'a... is a right necessarily arising from the personal independence (istiklâl-i dhâtî) that each individual by nature possesses." (Nâmlık Kemâl, Hukûk-i 'umûmiyye, loc. cit.). He was not deceived by the apparently liberal and constitutional aspects of the Tanzîmât [q.v.]. The reform edict of 1839 was not, as some had claimed, a fundamental constitutional charter (Sharf-nâme-i esâsî), but a measure of administrative westernization. "Had the Rescript not confined the general precepts of law set forth in its preamble to personal freedom (hürriyyet-i şahşîyye) alone, which it interpreted as security of life, property and honour, but also proclaimed such other basic principles as freedom of thought (hürriyyet-i efkâr), sovereignty of the people, and the system of government by consultation [i.e., representative and responsible government], then only could it have taken the character of a fundamental charter..." (İbret no. 46, 1872, cit. İhsan Sungu, Tanzimat ve Yeni Osmanlılar, in Tanzimat, i, Istanbul 1940, 845; English trans. in Lewis, Emergence, 167).

In 1876, with the promulgation of the first Ottoman constitution, the liberal and parliamentary programme of the Young Ottomans seemed to be on the point of realization. Article 10 of the constitution lays down that personal freedom is inviolable, and subsequent articles deal with freedom of worship, the press, association, education, etc., as well as with freedom from arbitrary violations of the rights of the person, residence and property. In its political provisions, however, the constitution is less libertarian. It derives not from the sovereignty of the people but from the will of the sovereign, who retains important prerogatives and all residual powers; it gives only perfunctory recognition to the principle of the separation of powers. Its effective life was in any case brief. In February 1878 parliament was dissolved; it did not meet again for thirty years.

Under 'Abd al-Hamid freedom was a proscribed word, and the ideals which it connoted became all the more precious. For Turkish modernists of that generation, the fountainhead was the West, which provided both material examples of the benefits of freedom, and intellectual guidance on the means of attaining it. "When you look upon this fascinating display of human progress", wrote Sa'dullâh from the Paris Exhibition of 1878, "do not forget that all these achievements are the work of freedom. It is under the protection of freedom that peoples and nations attain happiness. Without freedom, there can be no security; without security, no endeavour; without endeavour, no prosperity; without prosperity no happiness..." (Sa'dullâh Pasha, 1878 Paris Ekspozisyonu, in Ebül-Diyâ Tewfik, Nümüne..., 288; English trans. in B. Lewis, Middle East..., 47). As an earlier generation had turned to Voltaire, Rousseau and Montesquieu, so the new generation read the writings of Haeckel, Büchner, Le Bon (specially favoured because of his sympathy for Islam), Spencer, Mill and many others. "If there are today", wrote Hüseyin Rahmi in 1908, "men who can think, can write, and can defend freedom, they are those whose minds were enlightened by these sparks [of European culture]. In those dark and melancholy days, our friends, our guides were those intellectual treasures of the West. We learned the love for thinking, the love for freedom, from those treasures" (Preface to Shipsevdî, Istanbul 1912, English trans. in Niyazi Berkes, Secularism, 292). In more practical political terms, freedom meant constitutional and representative government—the ending of autocracy, the restoration of the constitution, and the safeguarding of the rights of the citizen by free elections and parliaments. But freedom was no longer a purely political matter. For some, the exponents of materialist and secularist ideas, it involved an intellectual liberation from what they saw as the shackles of religious obscurantism. Perhaps the first to conceive of liberation in social and economic terms was Prince Şabâh al-Dîn [q.v.], who sought to lead Turkey from a collectivist to an individualist social order by a policy of federalism and decentralization and by the encouragement of private enterprise. In 1902 he founded a society dedicated to the achievement of these purposes. Similar ideas inspired the Liberal Entente (Hürriyyet ve İttihâf [q.v.]), which appeared in 1911 as a rival to the Union and Progress Party [see İTTİHÂD VE TERAĞKÎ]. An interesting example of the use of the word in a social and individualist connotation is in Kâsim Amin's [q.v.] famous book Tahrîr al-mar'a, the liberation—i.e., emancipation—of woman (Cairo 1316/1898 and 1905; Turkish versions: Cairo 1326/1908, Istanbul 1329/1911, and, in Northern Turkish, Kazan 1909).

After the revolution of 1908 the establishment, for a while, of effective freedom of thought and expression initiated a period of vigorous discussion, in which the problem of freedom, with others, was examined, analysed, and discussed from many points of view; political, social, economic and religious freedom all find their exponents and defenders. But as the bonds of autocracy and censorship were wound tighter by the Young Turks, the debate dwindled into insignificance. In the new Turkey that emerged under the first and second republics, the discussion of freedom does not differ significantly from that of Europe, and need not be considered here.

Ottoman subjects from the Arab lands played a certain rôle in the libertarian movement almost from the beginning. On 24 March 1867, the Egyptian prince Muştafâ Fâdil Pasha [q.v.] published in the French newspaper Liberté an open letter to the Sultan, advising him to grant a constitution to the Empire (reprinted in Orient, no. 5 (1958), 29-38). Besides endowing them with their first manifestoes, the Pasha also helped the Young Ottoman exiles financially, and was later succeeded in this by his brother the Khedive Ismâ'îl, who saw in them a useful instrument of his political purposes. In Hamidian times, one of the first libertarian journals published in exile was started by Salim Fâris, a son of Aḥmad Fâris al-Shidyâk [q.v.]. Published in London in January 1894, it was entitled Hürriyyet—a significant evocation of the earlier Young Ottoman weekly. He was later induced by agents of the Sultan to cease publication. Other exiles included the Lebanese amîr Amin Arslân, who published an Arabic journal called Kashf al-Nikâb in Paris in 1895, and a former Syrian deputy in the Ottoman parliament of 1876, Khaliḡ Ghānim [q.v.], who became active in Young Turk circles. The ideas and arguments of the Young Ottomans and of the Young Turks found their echoes also in Arabic publications, which at this period tend to offer a provincial adaptation of ideas circulating among the Turkish ruling groups. Thus, the much discussed appearance of the motto Ḥubb al-waṭan min al-imân—"love of country is part of the faith"—on the Syrian fortnightly Al-Djinnân in 1870 follows its regular use in the Young Ottoman weekly Hürriyyet from 1868 to 1870; the growth of federalist groups among the Ottoman Arabs must be related to the federalist movement among the Turks.

In Egypt, under Khedivial and then British rule, political thought evolved along different lines, more directly influenced by Europe, and less directly affected by events and movements in the Ottoman Empire—though even here these had their effect. Many of the leaders of thought were Arabic-speaking emigrés from the Ottoman lands; the occasional presence and activity in Egypt of such Turkish personalities as Prince Şabâh al-Dîn and 'Abd Allâh Djewdet [q.v.] cannot have passed unnoticed. Wali al-Dîn Yakan [q.v.], of Turkish origin and a participant in Young Turk politics, wrote extensively in Arabic on political and social problems. A work of some influence was Djewdet's Turkish translation of Vittorio Alfieri's Della tirannide. Entitled simply İstibâd, it was first printed in Geneva in 1898 and reprinted in Cairo in 1909. This translation appears to underlie the famous Arabic adaptation of Alfieri's book by the Aleppine exile in Egypt, 'Abd al-Rahmân al-Kawâkibî [q.v.], entitled Tabâ'î' al-istibâd, Cairo n.d. (Sylvia G. Haim, Alfieri and al-Kawâkibî, in OM, xxxiv (1954), 321-34; E. Rossi, Una traduzione turca dell'opera "Della Tirannide" di V. Alfieri, ibid., 335-7).

One of the earliest discussions of freedom—little noticed at the time—in Egypt, after Shaykh Rifâ'a (see above) is that of the Azhari Shaykh Ḥusayn al-Marṣafî. In his Risâlat al-kalim al-ṭhamân—"Essay on eight words", published in Cairo in 1298/1881, he examines and interprets, for the benefit of "the intelligent young men of these times", eight political terms "current on the tongues of men" (p. 2). One of them is hurriyya (pp. 36-7), which the Shaykh explains in natural and social terms—the difference between men and beasts, the human habit of social specialization and association, and hence the need for social cooperation and the mutual recognition of rights. The Shaykh recognizes the necessity of freedom in this natural and social sense, but rather obscurely warns his young readers against untoward extensions of the concept into the realm of politics.

Despite such warnings, the influence of European liberal political thought continued to grow, and found frequent expression in Arabic as well as Turkish writings. The merits of freedom are variously presented and defended. For some, a vaguely understood freedom is still the secret talisman of Western prosperity and power; its adoption is therefore desirable in order to achieve the same results. For others, freedom means the overthrow of tyranny, usually identified with Sultan 'Abd al-Ḥamid, and the establishment of a constitutional régime in its place. Perhaps the last and most cogent exposition of the classical liberal position in Arabic is that of the Egyptian Aḥmad Luṭfi al-Sayyid (1872-1963). A declared disciple of J. S. Mill and other 19th century liberals, Luṭfi al-Sayyid gives a central position to the problem of liberty in his political thought. Freedom, basically, means the rights of the individual—his inalienable natural freedom, defined and safeguarded by civil rights, which in turn are secured by political and legal arrangements and institutions. The action and interference of the State must be kept at the minimum; the freedom of the individual and of the nation must be secured by a free press, an independent judiciary, and a constitutional régime guaranteeing the separation of powers.

Luṭfī al-Sayyid is concerned not only with the freedom of the individual, but also with that of the nation, which has corporate natural rights distinct from and additional to the aggregate of the rights of the individuals composing it. Rejecting pan-Islamism and disapproving of Arab nationalism, he sees the nation as Egypt, and argues for her liberation from both foreign rule and native authoritarianism.

The liberal interpretation of freedom continued to find exponents, particularly after the Young Turk revolution of 1908 and again after the military victory of the democracies ten years later. But in the meantime a new interpretation of freedom was gaining ground, resulting from the spread of imperialism and the rise of nationalism. In nationalist usage, freedom is a synonym for independence—the sovereignty of the nation state, untrammelled by any superior, alien authority. In the absence of any such subordination to aliens, a nation is called free, irrespective of the political, social and economic conditions prevailing within it. This interpretation of freedom had less impact among the Turks, whose independence, though threatened, was never lost, than among the Arab peoples for whom the main theme of political life was the ending of alien rule. During the period of British and French domination, individual freedom was never much of an issue. Though often limited and sometimes suspended, it was on the whole more extensive and better protected than either before or after. The imperial régimes conceded freedom but withheld independence; it was natural that the anti-imperialist struggle should concentrate on the latter and neglect the former. In the final revulsion against the West, Western democracy too was rejected as a fraud and a delusion, of no value to Muslims. The words liberty (hurriyya) and liberation (taḥrīr) retained their magic, but were emptied of that liberal individualist content which had first attracted Muslim attention in the 19th century. A few voices still spoke of personal, individual rights, and some writers used a word from the same root, taḥarrur, to denote psychological self-liberation, or emancipation (from the shackles of tradition etc.). But for most users of the word freedom was a collective, not an individual attribute; it was first interpreted politically, as independence, and then, when this by itself proved inadequate, reinterpreted in quasi-economic terms, as the absence of private or foreign exploitation.

On nationalism, see ḲAWMIYYA; on independence, İSTİKLÂL; on socialism, İSHṬIRÂKIYYA; on communism, SHUVU'İYYA; on autocracy, İSTİBÂD; on tyranny ZULM.

Bibliography: (a) Turkey: the most comprehensive account in a Western language of the history of ideas in Turkey is Niyazi Berkes, The development of secularism in Turkey, Montreal 1964. For a general history of contemporary thought in Turkey, see Hilmi Ziya Ülken, Türkiyede çağdaş düşünce tarihi, Konya 1966. On particular topics and periods, see Şerif Mardin, The genesis of young Ottoman thought, Princeton N.J. 1962; idem, The mind of the Turkish reformer 1700-1900, in The Western Humanities Review, xiv (1960), 413-36; idem, Libertarian movements in the Ottoman Empire 1878-1895, in MEJ, xvi (1962), 169-82; idem, Jön Türklerin siyasi fikirleri 1895-1908, Ankara 1964 (including an expanded Turkish version of the preceding article); E. E. Ramsaur, The Young Turks; prelude to the revolution of 1908, Princeton N.J. 1957; T. Z. Tunaya, Hürriyetin ilanı: ikinci Meşrutiyetin siyasi hayatına bakışlar, Istanbul 1959; idem, Türkiyenin siyasi hayatında batılılaşma hareketleri, Istanbul 1960. For briefer discussions of political thought in the context of events see B. Lewis, The emergence of modern Turkey, revised ed., London 1968.

(b) Arab lands: the pioneer work on modern Arab political thought is the much-used and insufficiently acknowledged anthology of Ra'if al-Ḳhūrī, al-Fikr al-'Arabī al-ḥadīth, Beirut 1943, a collection of excerpts, with an introduction, illustrating the influence on Arab thought of the French Revolution. The subject of freedom is discussed in a number of works on nationalism and related topics: H. Z. Nuseibeh, The ideas of Arab nationalism, Ithaca N.Y., 1956; J. M. Ahmed, The intellectual origins of Egyptian nationalism, London 1960; N. Safran, Egypt in search of political community, Cambridge Mass. 1961; Sylvia G. Haim, Arab nationalism, Berkeley and Los Angeles 1962; Ibrahim Abu-Lughod, The Arab rediscovery of Europe, Princeton N.J., 1963. Arab liberalism receives special attention in A. Hourani, Arabic thought in the liberal age 1798-1939, London 1962.

(c) General: L. Gardet, La cité musulmane: vie sociale et politique, Paris 1954; W. Cantwell Smith, Islam in modern history, Princeton N.J. 1957; W. Braune, Der islamische Orient zwischen Vergangenheit und Zukunft, Berne-Munich 1960; G. E. von Grunebaum, Modern Islam: the search for cultural identity, Berkeley and Los Angeles 1962; B. Lewis, The Middle East and the West, London-Bloomington Ind. 1964. (B. LEWIS)

HÜRRIYET WE İTİLAĞ FİRKASI ("Freedom and Accord Party"), also known as Entente Libérale ("Liberal Union"), Ottoman political party, formed on 21 November 1911. It succeeded a number of other liberal-conservative political parties formed after the 1908 revolution in opposition to the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) [see İTTİHÂD WE TERAḲKİ DİEM'İYETİ], including the Öthmānîl Akrâr Fırkası (1908), the Mu'tedil Hürriyetperverân Fırkası (1909), the Ahālî Fırkası (1910), and the Hizb-i Djedid (1911). It advocated a policy of administrative decentralization, opposition to radical social reform, and a laissez-faire economy as opposed to state intervention. In the Chamber of Deputies the Liberal Union rallied all those who had belonged to the Ahālî Fırkası as well as dissidents from the CUP.

The party was founded during the Turco-Italian war, when Unionist prestige was low. As in the past, personalities such as Dāmād Ferid, Kāmil Paṣṣa and Prince Şabāḥ al-Dīn continued to provide leadership and inspiration. The success of Ṭāḥir Ḳhayr al-Dīn, the Liberal candidate, in the Istanbul by-election on 11 December 1911 seemed to suggest that the tide had turned in favour of the Liberals (Ye'ni İhdām, 12 Dec. 1911; and the memoirs of Cavit (Djāwid [q.v.]) in Tanin, 30 Oct. 1943). Liberal hopes were dashed in the 1912 elections, which the Unionists manipulated ruthlessly, and this led the Liberals to turn to unconstitutional means to assume power.